LIFE FROM GOD.—<sup>44</sup>Jesus cried out and said, "Whoever believes in me believes not only in me but also in the one who sent me, <sup>45</sup>and whoever sees me sees the one who sent me. <sup>46</sup>I came into the world as LIGHT, so that everyone who believes in me might not remain in darkness.... <sup>48</sup>Whoever rejects me and does not accept my words has something to judge him: the word that I spoke, it will condemn him on the last day, <sup>49</sup>because I did not speak on my own, but the Father who sent me commanded me what to say and speak. <sup>50</sup>And I know that his commandment is eternal life. So what I say, I say as the Father told me."
John 12.44–50

Something of value at no cost.

Plan to take part in the Common Confession Rite scheduled for Sunday, 18 December, at 10:00 a.m. Come on time. And come in the right frame of mind. Let us greet the Feasts of Light as "a people of his own, eager to do what is right" (Titus 2.14). Remember, children are welcome, but for the concluding rite, none under the age of 10.

Metropolitan Tikhon sends greetings to President-elect Trump

SYOSSET, NY [OCA]

On Tuesday, November 15, 2016, His Beatitude, Metropolitan Tikhon, sent greetings to President-elect Donald J. Trump, wishing him well as he takes on "the heavy yoke of leadership of our United States of America."

"On behalf of the clergy and faithful of the Orthodox Church in America please accept my sincere greetings on your election as the 45th President of the United States of America," Metropolitan Tikhon wrote. "After a long and a hard-fought campaign in which the people of our nation expressed their will for the leadership of the United States, it is my prayer that healing and peace will come to this land so that we as a nation might continue the good work we have to do and, as Abraham Lincoln exhorted, that we do so ‘with malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right... [and] to bind up the nation’s wounds.’

“Indeed there is much to be done as we strive to maintain President George Washington’s vision of a republic that is ‘open to receive not only the opulent and respected stranger, but the oppressed and persecuted of all nations and religions, whom we shall welcome to a participation of all our rights and privileges,’” Metropolitan Tikhon concluded. “May our Lord Jesus Christ grant you wisdom, health, peace, well-being and spiritual strength as you take on the heavy yoke of leadership of our United States of America.”

Sisters Cecelia and Patricia on train to NYC

Nuns of New Skete Bake Cheesecake on Rachael Ray Show

Rachael Ray, celebrity chef and author, invited the Nuns of New Skete to appear on her television program, “The Rachael Ray Show,” in honor of the 50th Anniversary of New Skete. Growing up in the northeast part of New York State, Ms. Ray has been a fan of the nuns’ cheesecake ever since her mother introduced it to her when she was 7 years old.

On November 15, 2016, Sisters Cecelia and Patricia, along with a staff member, boarded a train bound for Rachael’s studio in New York City.

Arriving early, the sisters visited the Metropolitan Museum of Art. They enjoyed special exhibits, Jerusalem 1000–1400: Every People Under Heaven and Valentin de Boulogne: Beyond Caravaggio, as well as a quick tour through the collection of Impressionist paintings.

At the studio, Sister Cecelia and Sister Patricia were treated to some delicious samplings from the show’s culinary team and watched other guests on a large television monitor. Before heading to the studio stage, they met with the show’s producer and the culinary team in their test kitchen. They then went off to the set to meet with Rachael Ray and tape the segment for her show in front of a studio audience. Together with Ms. Ray, the sisters baked a cheesecake from a recipe in their cookbook Food for the Soul. The studio audience was treated to slices of New Skete Raspberry Ripple Cheesecake provided by the nuns. A resounding “mmm” and one-handed clapping were heard from those in attendance.

The segment is currently scheduled to air on Thursday, December 8.

St. John Chrysostom: The Prophet of Charity.

By Fr. Georges Florovsky

“There is some unusual flavor of modernity in the writings of Chrysostom. His world was like ours, a world of tensions, a world of unresolved problems in all walks of life. His advice may appeal to our age no less than it did to his own.”

Chrysostom was a powerful preacher. He was fond of preaching, and regarded preaching as the duty of a Christian minister. Priesthood is authority, but it is authority of word and conviction. This is the distinctive mark of Christian power. Kings compel, and pastors convince. The former act by orders, the latter by exhortations. Pastors appeal to human freedom, to human will and call for decisions. As Chrysostom used to say himself, “We have to accomplish the salvation of men by word, meekness, and exhortation.” The whole meaning of human life for Chrysostom was in that it was, and had to be, a life in freedom, and therefore a life of service. In his preaching he spoke persistently about freedom and decision. Freedom was for him an image of God in man. Christ came, as Chrysostom used to remind, precisely to heal the will of man. God always acts in such a way as not to destroy our own freedom. God himself acts by calls and exhortations, not by compulsion. He shows the right way, calls and invites, and warns against the dangers of wickedness, but does not constrain. Christian pastors must act accordingly. By temperament, Chrysostom was rather a maximalist, sharp and rigoristic, but he was always against compulsion, even in the struggle with heretics. Christians are forbidden, he used to insist, to apply violence even for good aims: “Our warfare does not make the living dead, but rather makes the dead to live, because it is conducted in the spirit of meekness and humility. I persecute by word, not by acts. I persecute heresy, not heretics. It is mine more to be persecuted, than to persecute. So Christ was victorious as a Crucified, and not as a crucifier.” The strength of Christianity was for him in humility and toleration, not in power. One had to be strict about oneself, and meek to the others. Yet, Chrysostom was in no sense a sentimental optimist. His diagnosis of the human situation was stern and grim. He lived in a time when the Church was suddenly invaded by crowds of nominal converts. He had an impression that he was preaching to the dead. He watched the lack of charity, and the complacent injustice and saw them almost in an apocalyptic perspective: “We have quenched the zeal, and the body of Christ is dead.” He had an impression that he was speaking to people for whom Christianity was just a conventional fashion, an empty form, a manner and little more: “Among the thousands one can hardly find more than a hundred of them who are being saved, and even about that I am doubtful.” He was rather embarrassed by the great number of alleged Christians: “an extra food for fire.” Prosperity was for him a danger, the worst kind of persecution, worse than an open persecution. Nobody sees dangers. Prosperity breeds carelessness. Men fall asleep, and the devil kills the sleepy. Chrysostom was disturbed especially by an open and deliberate lowering of standards and requirements, even among the clergy. Salt was losing its savour. He reacted to this not only by a word of rebuke and reprimand, but by deeds of charity and love. He was desperately concerned with the renewal of society, with the healing of social ills. He was preaching and practicing charity, founding hospitals and orphanages, helping the poor and destitute. He wanted to recover the spirit of practicing love. He wanted more activity and commitment among Christians. Christianity for him was precisely “the Way,” as it had been sometimes described in Apostolic times, and Christ himself was “the Way.” Chrysostom was always against all compromises, against the policy of appeasement and adjustment. He was a prophet of an integral Christianity. Chrysostom was mainly a preacher of morality, but his ethics were deeply rooted in the faith. He used to interpret Scripture to his flocks, and his favorite writer was St. Paul. It was in his epistles that one could see this organic connection between faith and life. Chrysostom had his favorite dogmatic theme, to which he would constantly return first of all, the theme of the Church, closely linked to the doctrine of Redemption, being the sacrifice of the High Priest Christ; the Church is the new being, the life in Christ, and the life of Christ in men. Secondly, the theme of Eucharist, a sacrament and a sacrifice. It is but fair to call Chrysostom, as he was actually called, “the teacher of Eucharist,” doctor eucharisticus. Both themes were linked together. It was in the Eucharist, and through it, that the Church could be alive. Chrysostom was a witness of the living faith, and for that reason his voice was so eagerly listened to, both in the East and in the West; but for him, the faith was a norm of life, and not just a theory. Dogmas must be practised. Chrysostom was preaching the Gospel of Salvation, the good tidings of the new life. He was not a preacher of independent ethics. He preached Christ, and him crucified and risen, the Lamb and the High Priest. Right life was for him the only efficient test of right beliefs. Faith is accomplished in the deeds, the deeds of charity and love. Without love, faith, contemplation, and the vision of the mysteries of God are impossible. Chrysostom was watching the desperate struggle for truth in the society of his own days. He was always concerned with living souls; he was speaking to men, to living persons. He was always addressing a flock, for which he felt responsibility. He was always discussing concrete cases and situations. One of his constant and favorite subjects was that of wealth and misery. The theme was imposed or dictated by the setting in which Chrysostom had to work. He had to face the life in great and overcrowded cities, with all the tensions between the rich and the poor. He simply could not evade social problems without detaching Christianity from life, but social problems were for him emphatically religious and ethical problems. He was not primarily a social reformer, even if he had his own plans for Christian society. He was concerned with the ways of Christians in the world, with their duties, with their vocation. In his sermons we find, first of all, a penetrating analysis of the social situation. He finds too much injustice, coldness, indifference, and suffering and sorrow in the society of his days. And he sees well to what extent it is connected with the acquisitive character of the contemporary society, with the acquisitive spirit of life. This acquisitive spirit breeds inequality, and therefore injustice. He is not only upset by fruitless luxury of life; he is apprehensive of wealth as a standing temptation. Wealth seduces the rich. Wealth itself has no value. It is a guise, under which the real face of man is concealed, but those who hold possessions come to cherish them, and are deceived; they come to value them and rely on them. All possessions, not only the large ones, are dangerous, in so far as man learns to rely upon what is, by its very nature, something passing and unreal. Chrysostom is very evangelical at this point. Treasures must be gathered in heaven, and not on earth, and all earthly treasures are unreal and doomed to corruption. "A love for wealth is abnormal," says Chrysostom. It is just a burden for the soul, and a dangerous burden. It enslaves the soul; it distracts it from the service to God. The Christian spirit is a spirit of renunciation, and wealth ties man to inanimate things. The acquisitive spirit distorts the vision, perverts the perspective. Chrysostom is closely following the injunctions of the Sermon on the Mount. "Do not be anxious for your life, what you shall eat, nor for your body, what you shall put on..." Life is greater than clothing or food, but it is anxiety which is the prevailing temper of the acquisitive society. Christians are called to renounce all possessions and to follow Christ in full confidence and trust. Possessions can be justified only by their use: feed the hungry, help the poor, and give everything to the needy. Here is the main tension, and the main conflict, between the spirit of the Church and the mood of the worldly society. The cruel injustice of actual life is the bleeding wound of this society. In a world of sorrow and need, all possessions are wrong—they are just proofs of coldness, and symptoms of little faith. Chrysostom goes so far as to denounce even the splendor of the temples. "The Church," he says, "is a triumphant company of angels, and not a shop of a silversmith. The Church claims human souls, and only for the sake of the souls does God accept any other gifts. The cup which Christ offered to the disciples at the Mystical Supper was not made of gold. Yet it was precious above all measure. If you want to honor Christ, do it when you see him naked, in the person of the poor. No use, if you bring silk and precious metals to the temple, and leave Christ to suffer cold and nakedness in the outside. No use, if the temple is full of golden vessels, but Christ himself is starving.

You make golden chalices, but fail to offer cups of cold water to the needy. Christ, as a homeless stranger, is wandering around and begging, and instead of receiving him you make decorations." Chrysostom was afraid that everything kept aside was in a sense stolen from the poor. One cannot be rich, except at the cost of keeping others poor. The root of wealth is always in some injustice. Yet, poverty was not for Chrysostom just a virtue by itself. Poverty meant for him, first of all, need and want, and suffering and pain. For this reason Christ can be found among the poor, and he comes to us in the guise of a beggar, and not in that of a rich man. Poverty is a blessing only when it is cheerfully accepted for Christ's sake. The poor have less anxiety than the rich and are more independent—or at least may be. Chrysostom was fully aware that poverty can be tempting too, not only as a burden, but as an incentive of envy or despair. For that very reason he wanted to fight poverty, in order not only to ease the suffering, but to remove temptations also. Chrysostom was always concerned with ethical issues. He had his own vision of a just society, and the first prerequisite was, in his opinion, equality. It is the first claim of any genuine love. But Chrysostom would go much further. He felt that there was but one owner of all things in the world—God himself, the Maker of all. Strictly speaking, no private property should exist at all. Everything belongs to God. Everything is loaned rather than given by God in trust to man, for God's purposes. Chrysostom would add: Everything is God's except the good deeds of man—it is the only thing that man can own. As everything belongs to God, our common Master, everything is given for common use. Is it not true even of worldly things? Cities, market-places, streets—are they not a common possession? God's economy is of the same kind. Water, air, sun and moon, and the rest of creation, are intended for common use. Quarrels begin usually when people attempt to appropriate things which, by their very nature, were not intended for the private possession of some, to the exclusion of others. Chrysostom had serious doubts about private property. Does not strife begin when the cold distinction "mine" and "thine" is first introduced? Chrysostom was concerned not so much with the results, as with causes—with the orientation of the will. Where is man going to gather his treasures? Chrysostom was after justice in defense of human dignity. Was not every man created in God's image? Did God not wish salvation and conversion of every single man, regardless of his position in life, and even regardless of his behavior in the past? All are called to repentance, and all can repent. There was, however, no neglect of material things in his preaching. Material goods come also from God, and they are not bad in themselves. What is bad, is only the unjust use of goods, to the profit of some, while others are left starving. The answer is in love. Love is not selfish, "is not ambitious, is not self-seeking." Chrysostom was looking back to the primitive Church. "Observe the increase of piety.

They cast away their riches, and rejoiced, and had great gladness, for greater were the riches they received without labor. None reproached, none envied, none grudged; no pride, no contempt. No talk of 'mine' and 'thine.' Hence gladness waited at their table; no one seemed to eat of his own, or another's. Neither did they consider their brethren's property foreign to themselves; it was a property of the Master; nor again deemed they ought their own, all was the brethren's." How was this possible? Chrysostom asks: By the inspiration of love, in recognition of the unfathomable love of God. In no sense was Chrysostom preaching "communism." The pattern itself may be deceitful and misleading as any other. The real thing is the spirit. What Chrysostom was preaching in the cities, monks were fervently practising in their communities, professing by deeds that God was the only Master and owner of everything. Chrysostom did not regard monastic life just as an advanced course for the select, but rather as a normal evangelical pattern intended for all Christians. At this point he was in full agreement with the main tradition of the early Church, from St. Basil and St. Augustine up to St. Theodore of Studios in later times. But the strength of monasticism is not in the pattern itself, but in the spirit of dedication, in the choice of a "higher calling." Was this calling only for the few? Chrysostom was always suspicious of inequality. Was it not dangerous to discriminate between the "strong" and the "weak"? Who could judge and decide in advance? Chrysostom was always thinking about real men. There was some kind of individualism inherent in his approach to people, but he valued unanimity most highly—the spirit of solidarity, of common care and responsibility, the spirit of service. No person can grow in virtue, unless he serves his brethren. For that reason he always emphasized charity. Those who fail to do charity will be left outside the bridal chamber of Christ. It is not enough, he says, to lift our hands to heaven; stretch them to the needy, and then you will be heard by the Father. He points out that, according to the Parable of the Last Judgment, the only question which will be asked then, is that about charity. But again it was not just a moralism with him. His ethics had an obvious mystical depth. The true altar is the body of men itself. It is not enough to worship at the altars. There is another altar made of living souls, and this altar is Christ himself, his Body. The sacrifice of righteousness and mercy should be offered on this altar too, if our offerings are to be acceptable in God's sight. The deeds of charity had to be inspired by the ultimate dedication and devotion to Christ, who came into the world to relieve all want, and sorrow, and pain. Chrysostom did not believe in abstract schemes; he had a fiery faith in the creative power of Christian love. It was for that reason that he became the teacher and prophet for all ages in the Church. In his youth he spent some few years in the desert, but would not stay there. For him monastic solitude was just a training period. He returned to the world to proclaim the power of the Gospel. He was a missionary by vocation; he had an apostolic and evangelistic zeal. He wanted to share his inspiration with his brethren. He wanted to work for the establishment of God's Kingdom. He prayed for such things in common life so that nobody would need to retire to the wilderness in search for perfection, because there would be the same opportunity in the cities. He wanted to reform the city itself, and for that purpose he chose for himself the way of priesthood and apostolate. Was this a utopian dream? Was it possible to reshape the world, and to overrule the worldliness of the world? Was Chrysostom successful in his mission? His life was stormy and hard, it was a life of endurance and martyrdom. He was persecuted and rejected not by the heathen, but by false brethren, and died homeless as a prisoner in exile. All he was given to endure he accepted in the spirit of joy, as from the hand of Christ who was himself rejected and executed. The Church gratefully recognized that witness and solemnly acclaimed Chrysostom as one of the "ecumenical teachers" for all ages to come. There is some unusual flavor of modernity in the writings of Chrysostom. His world was like ours, a world of tensions, a world of unresolved problems in all walks of life. His advice may appeal to our age no less than it did to his own. But his main advice is a call to integral Christianity, in which faith and charity, belief and practice, are organically linked in an unconditional surrender of man to God's overwhelming love, in an unconditional trust in his mercy, in an unconditional commitment to his service, through Jesus Christ, our Lord.

Archbishop Demetrios Receives 9th Century New Testament Manuscript from Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago.

NEW YORK—A rare ninth century Greek manuscript of the complete New Testament (Codex 1424) was handed over by the Rev. Dr. James Nieman, President of the Lutheran School of Theology at Chicago (LSTC) to Archbishop Demetrios of America during a dignified and well attended ceremony that took place at LSTC’s Augustana Chapel, Tuesday, Nov. 15, 2016. Archbishop Demetrios received the manuscript on behalf of Patriarch Bartholomew.

“For the past century, our school has stewarded this book that rightly belongs to your tradition within its original home,” said LSTC President Rev. Dr. James Nieman as he was handing the manuscript to Archbishop Demetrios and continued: “We are thankful for this brief moment it has had in our midst, and now gratefully yet sadly release it for the next part of its journey. May God bless us both through the living word of Christ that it bears, and may God guard you with a safe return and joyful homecoming. In handing this book now to you, let all gathered here know that it passes from our care to yours, ever for God’s glory. Amen.”

The manuscript, known among biblical scholars as Codex 1424, was one of many manuscripts stolen in 1917, along with many similar items, from the Monastery of Panagia Eikosifoinissa, in the Pangaion mountain range near the city of Drama, in Greece, following the Balkan Wars of five years earlier. It found its way to a European book dealer and was purchased in 1920 by Levi Franklin Gruber, who later became president of Chicago Lutheran Theological Seminary, one of LSTC’s predecessor schools. Gruber bequeathed the codex to his widow, and the seminary later received his entire rare book collection from her. Earlier this year, the Patriarchate of Constantinople directly and through its representation in the United States, requested the return of the manuscript, to which LSTC voluntarily and readily agreed.

The codex is an important document for the study of New Testament history and research. Furthermore, the action of the return of this manuscript by LSTC becomes an event enhancing ecumenical relationships. We hope that other places holding items from the same monastery will in a similar manner follow the remarkable action of the aforementioned prominent theological institution,” said the Archbishop emphatically.

Early next month, Archbishop Demetrios of America will travel to Greece and repatriate this rare manuscript of the New Testament to the eparchy of Drama and to the Monastery of Panagia Eikosifoinissa.
